Apple has slowly opened the gates to the Mother Homa Garden which was once its mobile operating system on iOS, and with pretty good results. With iOS 8, for example, it announced that third-party keyboards could replace the single keyboard and iPhone sex, and, soon, the Apple Store was flooded with great virtual keyboards with additional functionality, so users certainly appreciated the move. The company pay attention, and with iOS 10 edition, it pipped out the iMessage API for third-party developers as well. Of course, not every function or control is given to foreigners, but the combination is more than enough for talented app writers to come up with great solutions. There are currently a number of external devs who took advantage of the newly acquired approach to Apple's would-be chat app, and folded it into their own plugins. These come from a variety of industries - sports, retail and so on - so wherever you are, you can communicate with the chat functions you've become accustomed to. We're lining up some good iMessage integration examples to check on your phone or iPad. Just go to the iMessage app drawer, tap the Store icon and look for the right suffix.
